

HOW

House of Words

How to “Host” History-Making | House of Words (HoW)

Katherine Finerty

A story within a story... embodies the notion of history as a collective and radical act. History here is not framed as something that can be found in a textbook, or told by “the winners.” Rather, it is a communication by all who partake in its experience, and thus history itself is intrinsically a participatory experience. In order to ignite the fundamental spirit of storytelling and togetherness distinguishing this edition of the biennial, GIBCA and the Public Art Agency Sweden/Statens konstråd present the site-specific project House of Words (HoW) – a temporary pavilion designed by architect Santiago Cirugeda - Recetas Urbanas and activated by artist Loulou Cherinet.

House of Words refers to “la Casa de la Palabra” – a traditional meeting place common in some African societies providing a hub for oral history, storytelling, performance, and ritual. GIBCA 2015’s HoW functions as a social platform for multidisciplinary discussion, exchange, and collaboration throughout the course of the biennial and beyond. Its construction, led by Santiago Cirugeda, has consisted of a collective process engaging individuals and local communities from Gothenburg and elsewhere. HoW has been built with recycled materials and is temporarily physically attached to the Röda Sten Konsthall. Within it Loulou Cherinet has created a relational community project hosting a series of roundtable dinner conversations. Cherinet’s project will be complemented by a public program curated in collaboration with GIBCA 2015 curator Elvira Dyangani Ose addressing ideas about how participatory practices may create an activated social space where the notion of “publicness” will ultimately be framed through a powerful sense of “togetherness.”

HoW strives to be one of the most socially engaged features in the eighth edition of GIBCA, remaining accessible, critical, and reactive. It will involve not only cultural producers, but also members of civil society and public authorities. It will also specifically engage groups considered living in “utanförskap” (outsiderness) – a label popularized by the Swedish media that constitutes the subject of Cherinet’s research and programming. This social concept includes an ever-growing array of people, including the homeless, unemployed youth, the elderly without computers, housewives, gaming addicts, asylum seekers, women wearing niqab, and scientists, among many others. By providing a place for diverse individuals and communities from Sweden and across the globe to participate in genuine, relevant, and hands-on history-making, HoW hopes to create an environment that questions radical contingency by fueling collective agency.

Through its intention to facilitate an activated space for participatory experiences, House of Words enters into a discourse of cultural institutions, events, and exhibitions focusing on socially engaged platforms and instigating a whole new assembly of socio-politically loaded questions pertinent to audience engagement today. Of particular relevance to HoW, and the contemporary social context of Sweden, is the question of how to encourage diverse groups of people to genuinely participate in a space where they feel welcome and empowered rather than ghettoized or exploited. How can we “host” a space in which people contribute through sincere agency rather than just contrived performance? How can all who partake – architect, volunteer, artist, curator, host, audience – be equal? Who is “hosting” whom?

A story within a story... has embarked upon answering these questions by first acknowledging the site-specific context in which HoW will operate: as a container/prosthesis occupying a public space while attached to the Röda Sten Konsthall in the working-class neighborhood of Majorna, Gothenburg. Moreover, the pavilion aims to address Sweden’s current political climate with regards to national politics and its vital impact on society and culture by focusing on the shifting relations between center and periphery. It strives to provide a productive and safe platform for some of these topical and essential conversations to take place.

This very gesture started with the methodology in which HoW has been conceived and then constructed: bottom-up by professionals, volunteers, and instructors from local communities working together a month before the biennial’s official opening. A key starting point is Cirugeda’s architectural practice, based on developing subversive projects that address the urban realities and negotiations between legal and illegal zoning in order to realize ambitious outcomes, from new housing models for the socially disadvantaged to temporary sites for community discussion and cultural intervention. Good music, good food, and a sense of celebration have been prioritized throughout HoW’s building process as much as proper footwear, safety, and finding the right job for everyone who wants to be a part of the team.

Furthermore, this ethos of physically and communally integrating the role of the public into the creation of HoW beyond the official course of the biennial is also essential to Cherinet’s artistic activation of the pavilion. During the months leading up to GIBCA 2015, she has lived in Gothenburg and collaborated with individuals and local communities in order to establish a context for people to voice their social, political, and cultural concerns through multiple forms of expression. Cherinet’s artistic practice often involves video installations that stage spaces for storytelling and dialogue that examine the impact of state policy and media rhetoric on the fabric of specific communities. In order to engage local audiences and international visitors in Gothenburg, she seeks to initiate HoW as a space that is at once informal in its relevant usefulness and usability, but also formal in its programmed discussions, screenings, and performances. A series of weekly filmed roundtable storytelling sessions will be organized by the artist alongside curator Dyangani Ose, a series of HoW hosts, and the audience themselves. This will initiate an evolving medley of sessions in which the hosts, storytellers, and participants are never limited or static. The reoccurring format of these sessions will include a roundtable studio setting with a seating area, camera, and microphones, enabling all interactions to be recorded and accessible online as an expanding archive.

In keeping with the biennial's integral inspiration of history as an "open work," HoW sessions will specifically address history-making through acts of collective storytelling that intervene in the public sphere of Gothenburg and activate ideas of participation and collaboration. Leading themes will include the following: Postcolony (de-constructing the notions of decolonization, after-colonialism, post-colonialism, and neo-colonialism); Participatory Architecture (engaging notions of the public space, public sphere, urban ethnography, and the participatory ethos behind structures like HoW itself); Community and Participatory Politics (focusing on various notions of community, the dissolution of an individual's agenda in the collective act, and ideas of democracy, political identity, power relations, and participatory decision-making); The Museum (analyzing the institutional framework of art institutions and questioning the inherent hierarchies of such framework); Environment (addressing geo-politics through sustainability and locational framings of ecology); Anti-University (addressing subversive learning initiatives and the collective refusal to conform to a canonized education, as demonstrated by platforms such as the Anti-University); and Queerness (interrogating the politicization of identity and celebration of non-conformist ambiguity). All of these themes, however, are leading points of departure rather than mandatory arguments.

The roundtable discussions, like HoW's own construction, are conceived as actions of involvement, endowing the project with an ongoing sense of dynamism and transformation. HoW envisions gathering people together to talk about ideas pertaining to collectivity, publicness, collaboration, and participation – there are no hierarchies. By engaging in an energy as subversive as it is accessible and as radical as it is collective, HoW aims to directly activate the potentially paradoxical ideas of "outsiderness" and "togetherness." It provides a participatory platform in which distinct national and trans-national perspectives can be discussed and challenged.

Yet how may this initiative create something substantial and sustainable, despite its time and site-specific nature? Ultimately, the point of House of Words is to create an assembly – a space for everyone to galvanize a distinctly collective and democratic identity, together. This open platform works to create a completely new kind of institution – a space for genuine social dialogue focusing on all aspects of life, expanding beyond the status of art and high culture. HoW's creation is dependent on research and collaboration initiatives that started long before A story within a story..., and it is therefore our aspiration that the storytelling it enables will last long after. House of Words (HoW) is thus not only a place for hosting and history-making – it is ultimately a place for hope.